The most defining characteristic of a cinematographer is their ability to see beyond the camera. While filmmakers tend to think of what they want the camera to do, they are often limited by the imagination of those who hired them. This is one of the many reasons why the cinematographer is so integral to the process. While other crew members may specialize in a particular skill set or aspect of the filmmaking process, the cinematographer's skill and imagination are necessary to make the film great. As I learned when I began my cinematography career, some directors find it more difficult to let the camera do what it is meant to do than others. In this article, I'd like to share my experience and my thoughts on cinematographers and how to find a home for yourself in the industry. Finding the Magic Number During my first days of working in the industry, my friend showed me a picture of a clapboard house in the Hollywood Hills. This was taken by a famous director of photography and was part of an advertisement for a few different camera manufacturers. The design of the advertisement is simple: The house is lit by the sunlight coming through the window. No house is actually in front of the window, and no other elements are visible. Instead, the house is lit by the sun, which filters through the window. It's a beautiful photograph, and I wish I could remember the name of the director who took it. This image was important to me because it served as a reminder of what a director's vision for a film is. It's a photograph that forces us to imagine a story about a clapboard house in the Hollywood Hills. It's a photograph that gets into our heads and makes the story come alive in our imagination. Since the commercial, I've tried to keep a visual memory of this scene in my mind. The picture of the house became more important to me as I began to think about who I wanted to become as a cinematographer. As a young professional, I thought that the most important thing was to have a clear vision of what I wanted to accomplish as a filmmaker. In the beginning of your career, you want to look for someone who is at the peak of their career. They've worked with major productions and will have good equipment that they're able to work with and budget that doesn't impede the ability to achieve the vision you want 82157476af
